How districts can avoid copyright infringement claims and what you can do

Copyright infringement is an issue that districts around the country are facing. In recent years, copyright infringement trolls have spearheaded claims against schools that use unlicensed media improperly on their websites, in marketing, and in classroom resources.

The cost of such claims for some districts, schools, and public libraries can be significant. This guide walks you through the complexity of verifying copyright terms and helps you to eliminate guesswork when selecting media.
Support culturally responsive teaching practices through hundreds of thousands of diverse, cross-cultural images of people, events, traditions, places, foods, histories, and more.

- Empower students to share their cultures and heritage with you and with each other
- Foster empathy, curiosity, and understanding within students for other classmates’ cultures and backgrounds
- Incorporate the traditions of students in your lessons with images
- Support cross-cultural connections and discussions in blended learning environments through powerful, engaging imagery
ImageQuest has numerous collections that support culturally responsive teaching.

The Africa Media Online collection is built with images from indigenous photographers and photo archives. The collection provides an outlet to allow Africans to tell the story of Africa through rich, breathtaking photography that covers the African continent. With more than 150,000 images from whole sources, Africa Media Online’s unique vision and development of its indigenous sources have rewarded the world with content not readily available elsewhere.

Disability Images is a leading provider of positive lifestyle images of real people with real disabilities. The collection is carefully edited and shows people with disabilities in their daily lives – working, socializing, in school, at play, etc. Disability Images is part of the Huntstock collection, which specializes in real people and places with specific concentrations in Hispanic culture and people over 60 years old.

The Withers Collection offers comprehensive coverage of the United States civil rights movement during the turbulent 1960s, through the lens of photographer Dr. Ernest Withers. The Collection also features subjects from the 1950s through the early 1990s ranging from notable leaders of the civil rights movement to events such as the annual NAACP convention to protests and boycotts that inspired positive changes in the United States and worldwide.

Nativestock Pictures is the largest image and stock footage collection specializing in Native American culture, traditions, and ethnicity. Nativestock Pictures features in-depth coverage on specific tribes, cultural regions, traditional people, ways of life, and more. Detailed captions and locations are included.

The Universal History Archive includes fine art and historical illustrations and images spanning the past 500 years. This world history archive features sub-collections that focus on specific regions and cultures, including the Middle East, South America, India, Asia.
